

BIOSITE PROJECT — PREP MODULE

Nick & his guitar

a bioSite design package

CSD-340 · Web Development with HTML and CSS

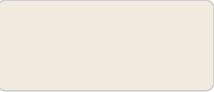

Prepared by Megan Mosier

Module submission · Atomic Design pattern library

DELIVERABLE 1

Front-end style guide

Color palette

Charcoal slate #2C3539 primary background	Deep blue #1F3A4D secondary background	Walnut wood #7C5A38 surface	Goldenrod #D4A24C primary accent	Pine green #56684B secondary accent	Warm cream #F2EBE0 accent only

Charcoal and deep blue carry the page as background and text. Walnut adds a warm surface option. Goldenrod is the single primary accent — buttons, links, highlights. Pine green is a secondary accent used sparingly in tags and small details. Cream is reserved for hairlines, outlines, and small labels rather than large surfaces.

Typography

Nick & his guitar

Heading font — serif (Georgia / Playfair Display) · page titles & section headers

Every evening at the cabin, the same ritual: case open, tuning by ear, the first few notes drifting out over the water.

Body font — sans-serif (system sans / Lato) · paragraphs, captions, nav

Atoms — buttons & tags

Read his storyView hobbiesGuitaristIdaho cabin

Molecule — image + caption card

photo placeholder

At the cabin, summer 2025

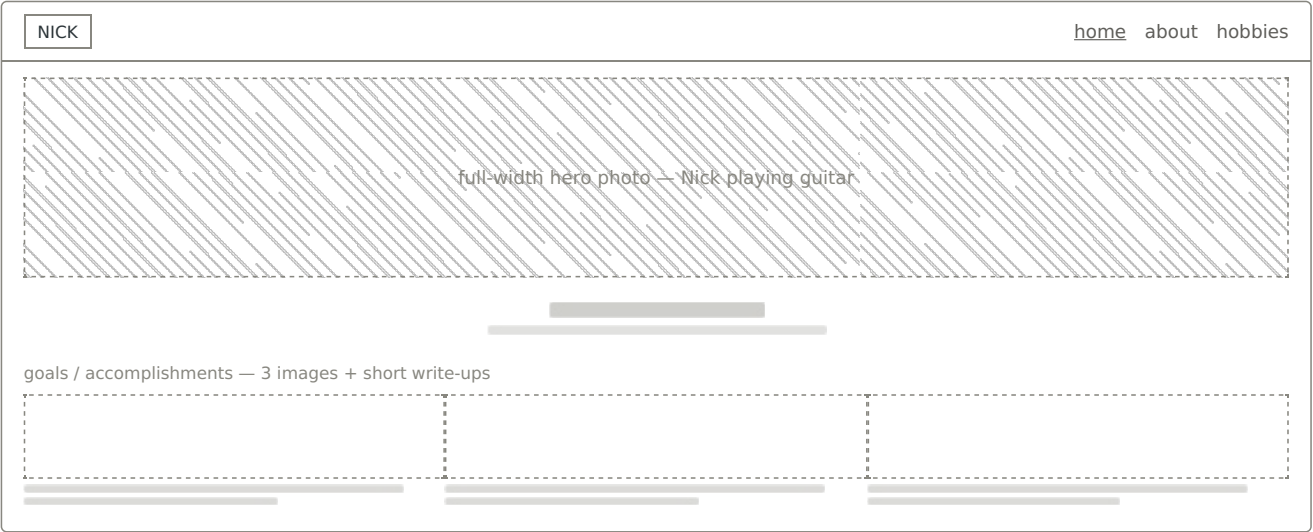

Where most of his playing happens — porch, sunset, no audience but the lake.

Per Atomic Design principles, the colors and type above are this site's atoms. The button and tag examples are atoms; the image + caption card is a molecule, combining multiple atoms (image, heading, text) into a reusable unit applied across the landing and hobbies pages.

DELIVERABLE 2

Wireframes

Landing page

About page

Hobbies page

Low-fidelity wireframes for all three required pages, sketched digitally from an initial paper-and-pencil layout pass. Symmetric, centered composition was chosen deliberately to reflect Nick's calm, unhurried, solo approach to playing — consistent nav across all pages reinforces site-wide structure.

DELIVERABLE 3

Subject interview

Interview conducted with Nick, subject of the bioSite project, on his history and relationship with playing guitar.

1. How long have you been playing guitar, and what got you started?

Nick's been playing guitar since he was 14. His sister had a guitar and that made him really want to play it. He started out on bass, but that's more challenging to play by yourself, so he decided to give guitar a try.

2. Was there a specific moment or person that made you want to keep playing?

When Nick wrote his own song, that made him want to continue. He also loved playing along to punk rock because it was fun, but as far as a person goes, guitar is very personal to him, so there wasn't a specific person who made him want to continue.

3. How would you describe your playing style or the genres you gravitate toward?

Basic, rhythmic guitar — campfire style.

4. What's your guitar setup like — what do you play, and why that one?

Right now he likes playing a 12-string because his wife gave it to him. It's pretty and sounds good when strummed.

5. Do you write your own music, play covers, or both? Walk me through your process.

Both. When it comes to singing, he likes to play his own, but to practice he likes to play covers — they're fun to play along to.

6. What's the hardest song or technique you've worked to learn, and what got you through it?

Hammer-ons — where you press on a note on the next fret to give the note variation. Practice is what got him through it. "Knuckle down, buckle down, and practice." You have to be patient with yourself.

7. What does playing guitar give you that other things don't?

It gives him clarity. It's easy to just think about playing guitar while playing guitar. It also gives him a sense of pride — playing and writing music is hard, and he takes pride in that.

8. Is there a song or artist that changed how you think about music?

Leonard Cohen, Tom Waits, and David Byrne and the Talking Heads.

9. Have you ever played for other people — a gig, an open mic, just friends? What was that like?

Yes — he's done a couple of concerts with a band, and a couple of solo shows, but he gravitates toward open mics, because he found it really hard to play for people he knew. He gravitated toward strangers instead.

10. Is there a goal you have with guitar — a song you want to master, a style you want to explore, anything you'd love to do with it someday?

He would love to play alongside a family member. He'd love to master more complex fills. He would also like to write a new song — it's been a while since he's written one with vocals.

11. If you could only keep one guitar, which would it be and why?

His blue Ibanez. It's the guitar his wife gave him when they got married. Even if he never played it again, he'll always keep it.

12. What's a guitar memory that still makes you smile?

Playing guitar in Idaho, on the porch, looking toward the Teton Mountains.

DELIVERABLE 4

Subject bio

Nick picked up a guitar for the first time at fourteen, inspired by his sister, who already had one sitting around the house. He tried bass first, but found it wasn't built for playing alone — so he switched to guitar, and never looked back.

What kept him going wasn't a mentor or a single defining moment. It was writing his first song, and discovering that punk rock was simply fun to play along to. Over the years, his style settled into something simple and rhythmic — what he calls “campfire style” — shaped by influences like Leonard Cohen, Tom Waits, and David Byrne and the Talking Heads.

These days, Nick splits his time between writing his own music and playing covers just for the joy of it. He's worked through real challenges along the way, like mastering hammer-ons, a technique that took nothing but patience and practice — “knuckle down, buckle down,” as he puts it.

He's played in bands, done solo shows, and tried his hand at open mics, where, oddly enough, he found it easier to play in front of strangers than for people he knows well. For Nick, guitar isn't about performance. It's about clarity — a rare space where his mind can focus on one thing, and a quiet source of pride in something he's worked hard to build.

His favorite guitar right now is a 12-string his wife gave him, prized simply because of who gave it to him and how good it sounds when strummed. But if he could keep only one, it would be his blue Ibanez — the guitar she gave him on their wedding day. Looking ahead, Nick hopes to write another song with vocals, master more complex fills, and someday play alongside a family member. Some of his favorite memories are simple ones: sitting on the porch of their cabin in Idaho, guitar in hand, looking out toward the Tetons.

~250 words · to be placed on the About page, above the portrait per the wireframe layout

DELIVERABLE 5

Project images

Hobby images — for the hobbies page (3 of 3)

hobby

On the porch, Idaho

This is the memory Nick named as his favorite: playing guitar on the porch of their family cabin, looking out toward the Teton Mountains. It anchors the “campfire style” identity that runs through the whole project — solo, unhurried, surrounded by nature rather than an audience.

hobby

Mid-song, at home

A candid shot of Nick playing indoors, with two more guitars visible on the wall behind him. It shows the everyday, practiced side of his hobby — this isn’t a special occasion, it’s simply part of his routine, and hints at how many instruments are part of his life.

hobby

Open mic, 12-string

Nick performing live with the 12-string his wife gave him. This image ties directly to two parts of his interview: his preference for playing open mics over performing for people he knows, and his attachment to this particular guitar. It represents the more public, vulnerable side of his hobby.

Goals / accomplishments / embellishments — for the landing page (1 of 3)

embellishment

The plaid shirt collection

A lighthearted, true-to-character detail: Nick only wears plaid shirts. This image captures his personality and sense of humor outside of music, which helps round out his story on the landing page as more than “a guy who plays guitar” — he has a recognizable, consistent personal style.

2 additional goals / accomplishments / embellishment images still to be photographed this week.
Planned subjects: a moment tied to his goal of writing a new song with vocals, and/or his relationship with his guitars (e.g., the blue Ibanez given to him on his wedding day).

Portrait — for the about page (1 of 1)

portrait

Nick, portrait

A clear, current, well-lit portrait of Nick, cropped tightly to him alone. This will sit above the 250-word bio on the About page, per the wireframe layout.

All images were sourced from personal, current photos taken by the subject's family — none were pulled from social media. No personally identifying information (addresses, phone numbers, last names, etc.) appears in any image or write-up.